Consuming Passions: Leisure and Pleasure in Victorian Britain

By Judith Flanders

HarperCollins Publishers. Paperback. Book Condition: new. BRAND NEW, Consuming Passions: Leisure and Pleasure in Victorian Britain, Judith Flanders, A delightful and fascinating social history of Victorians at leisure, told through the letters, diaries, journals and novels of nineteenth-century men and women, from the author of the bestselling 'The Victorian House'. Imagine a world where only one in five people owns a book, where just one in ten has a knife or a fork - a world where five people out of every six do not own a cup to hold a hot drink. That was what England was like in the early eighteenth century. Yet by the close of the nineteenth century, the Industrial Revolution had brought with it not just factories, railways, mines and machines but also fashion, travel, leisure and pleasure. Leisure became an industry - a cornucopia of excitement for the masses - and it was spread by newspapers, advertising, promotions and publicity - all of which were eighteenth-century creations. It was Josiah Wedgwood and his colleagues who invented money-back guarantees, free delivery and celebrity endorsements. New technology such as the railways brought audiences to ever-more-elaborate extravaganzas, whether it was theatrical spectacles with breathtaking pyrotechnics and hundreds...

A delightful and fascinating social history of Victorians at leisure, told through the letters, diaries, journals and novels of nineteenth-century men and women, from the author of the bestselling 'The Victorian House'. Product Identifiers. Publisher. The Victorian leisure revolution makes little sense without some acquaintance with the ancient regime of popular culture in Britain, and its œmodernization under the impetus of the Industrial Revolution.Â Both were collective activities: both mixed pleasure and utility. No clock called a halt to one in order for the other to begin. Before the Industrial Revolution, time was measured in terms of seasons, not hours.Â Finally, Peter Baileyâ€™s Leisure and Class in Victorian England: Rational Recreation and the Contest for Control, 1830-1885 is a detailed, closely-reasoned assessment of the transformation of both middle-class and working-class leisure patterns, with specific reference to the case of Bolton, a new industrial town in Lancashire. Robert Douglas-Fairhurst reviews Consuming Passions: Leisure and Pleasure in Victorian Britain by Judith Flanders. Writing in 1875, W R Greg complained that "the most salient characteristic of life in this latter portion of the 19th century is its SPEED". Those urgent capital letters nicely capture the mixed feelings of worry and excitement that were widespread at a time when everything and everyone appeared to be on the move. Railways were carving their way through the landscape and into the national imagination: from straggly beginnings in the 1830s, by the time Greg published his

It covers more than Victorian Britain, and touches on the shopping experience and the rise of the cash economy, it gives colour and life to social history, and there is nothing new in 3-D movies - they had train crashes on stage before the cinema. Not a quick read, but a text which really brings the past to life. Likewise, although the title of the book refers to Victorian Britain, large parts of it deal with the 18th century, and the first 37 years of the 19th century before Queen Victoria came to the throne. The impression that you get reading the book is that Judith Flanders made enormous numbers of notes, then, without reviewing the material critically or discarding anything, rough sorted them by topic, and then sat down to write. In her splendid book on Victorian "leisure and pleasure", Judith Flanders devotes a whole chapter to Christmas; this is hardly surprising, for it is and was then a retailers’ paradise. The key components of the "traditional" Christmas were available for purchase in all good stores and the canny entrepreneurs of 19th-century Britain seized their opportunities. Consuming Passions covers such a vast amount of ground that reading it can sometimes feel rather like watching a fast moving conveyor belt of consumer durables which have flashed by before you have time to examine them fully. And I could have done with a little more about the humans behind the goods: the ambitious, ingenious, ruthless visionaries who caught and exploited the spirit of their age. Consuming Passions tells the story of Victorian leisure and pleasure as an interrelated and intricate set of transformations; a fascinating, bewildering, marvel-crammed quest. Guardian. In 'Consuming Passions', the bestselling author of 'The Victorian House' explores this dramatic revolution in science, technology and industry -- and how a world of thrilling sensation, lavish spectacle and unimaginable theatricality was born. Ten New Year’s Resolutions, Maine Memory Style. In the waning moments of 2011, we thought we’d have a little fun. From the reviews of Consuming Passions: "Over the course of the nineteenth century, a whole new world opened up to an ever-growing section of the population—a world of retail choice, of travel for pleasure, of cultural and sporting diversion. It is a world explored with much wit and insight by Judith Flanders…The subject is a large one. A deeply satisfying exploration of how the Victorians pursued their leisure time! Bursting with original research and statistics, it gives a panoramic view of Victorians at play. Country Life. A fascinating look at the birth of leisure. Britain, the world’s first industrial society, will lead the way into a glorious future, which can be seen, all mapped out, in the courts and aisles of the Crystal Palace. It covers more than Victorian Britain, and touches on the shopping experience and the rise of the cash economy, it gives colour and life to social history, and there is nothing new in 3-D movies—they had train crashes on stage before the cinema. The Victorians themselves, though, weren’t so sure. George Eliot reckoned that leisure had vanished from the industrial age (it was 'gone where the spinning-wheels are gone, and the pack-horses, and the slow waggons'), and that pleasure could not cohabit with frenzied consumerism: "Even idleness is eager now—eager for amusement, prone to excursion trains, art museums, periodical literature and exciting novels." Jacqueline Banerjee, Contributing Editor, Victorian Web (UK). [Victorian Web Home > Victorian Authors > Reviews of Recent Scholarship]. And then along comes a book that really opens the lid on the astonishing diversity and energy of the Victorian period. It might be something out of the way, like Ruth Cowen’s new biography of Alexis Soyer, our first celebrity chef (Relish, 2006); or something apparently quite "standard," like Lionel Lambourne’s wonderfully wide-ranging Victorian Painting (1999). But whatever it is, the smoggy skies of the nineteenth-century are suddenly lit up by dazzling... Judith Flanders. Consuming Passions: Leisure and Pleasure in Victorian Britain.
